DARK STREETS

Old Joe had lived on the street in Kings Cross for a long time. Those that knew him regarded him as harmless, although he was a nuisance cadging money from passers-by.

However, someone regarded him as more, the reason he was found dead one morning on Darlinghurst Road. This was Kings Cross, once a hub of inequity, of strip joints and gentleman's clubs, of licenced premises and restaurants. But now, the area is changing, going upmarket, another enclave for those that can afford it, not a place for the homeless, nor is it a place of murder, but then, another murder in Point Piper, upmarket and exclusive, a woman, her throat cut.

Detective Gary Haddock's a seasoned hand in Homicide, but he's baffled by the murders. Statistically, Sydney's Eastern Suburbs doesn't have murder, but after four, are they serial or random, and if they are, why?

Sergeant Natalie Campbell from Kings Cross Police Station is wet behind the ears when she pairs with Haddock, but soon learns that she is more astute than the man, although she's a risk taker. He has to protect her, but she will take the investigations forward.
